From Publishers WeeklyBy turns nostalgic, whimsical and cantankerous, Gould has entertained readers for half a century through his columns in the Christian Science Monitor. In this collection (his 27th book), he carps about senior-citizen status and drive-through banking. While chronicling the progress of Maine's publicity drive for tourism, Gould reminisces about the "real" Maine boiled dinner and the rite of preparing the wood stove for its summer in the shed. There is a piece about a carpenter who measured in platts and pobbles, and others about the Maine Coon cat, the leash law (he's ag'in it), winter camping and "summerfolk." These brief essays view human nature under a strong regional light. Illustrations. Copyright 1993 Reed Business Information, Inc.
